Welcome Messages

THE DIRECTOR OF THE INSTITUTION OF HUMANITIES STUDIES, KNU
PRESIDENT OF ASSOCIATION FOR ASIAN STUDIES
VICE MAYOR FOR ECONOMIC AFFAIR IN DAEGU
WELCOME TO KNU
I would like to express my deepest gratitude to the AAS President Jean Oi, AAS board members, and 1,200 scholars and students from 40 countries who are visiting Kyungpook National University for sharing their research in Asian studies.

Under the theme of Memory, Preservation and Documentation, this conference was designed to look back on the dynamic past of Asia, to reflect on the present, and to look into the future. As is well known, Asia is the world’s largest and most populous continent, with approximately 60% of the world’s population residing in Asia. In addition, Asia has contributed to the development of human history as the birthplace of three of the world’s four major civilizations, and today plays an important and meaningful role in all areas of politics, economy, society, and culture in the world.

This year’s conference will pursue recreating this dynamic aspect of Asia in memories and records, and suggesting a future-oriented path for Asian studies. To this end, we prepared keynote lectures by two world-renowned scholars, special round tables with 17 distinguished speakers, and 274 panels with 1,200 speakers. We hope that our efforts will not only open up a new era for Asian studies, but also sublimate it into an academic festival that accumulates and spreads valuable research in Asian studies.

In recent years, international tension, confrontation, and war have become common in the world, and the Asian region is also becoming an arena of competition for world hegemony centered on the great powers. We are falling into the maelstrom of the AI era that is deepening inequality. Thus, there is some worry that the global community today is falling into the danger of co-extinction in a completely different way than in the last century.
In this situation, although it is a long way off, we put small but non-trivial efforts to provide an opportunity for humanistic discourse to protect the essence and dignity of human beings, and to seek ways for the world to understand and communicate with each other.

Lastly, I would like to thank my colleagues who have worked hard and supported for the successful hosting of this conference: Dr. Hilary Finchum-Sung and Dr. Krisna Uk from the AAS Headquarters, Professor Hyaeweol Choi from Iowa University, Professor Jean Oi from Stanford University. I wish to express my sincere gratitude to the following organizations that sponsored this year’s conference: Kyungpook National University, Daegu City, Korea Foundation Daegu Convention Bureau, National Research Foundation of Korea, and Daegu Bank. Without their financial support, the conference could not be successful. I also would like to thank PlanB Co., Ltd., which was in charge of the practical operation of the conference and faculty members of the college of Humanities at Kyungpook National University, in particular professor Hungu Cho, Seungwan Ha, Heejin Kim and Jonghee Kim. Last but not least, I am grateful for Hyunae Baek, Hyejin Lee and Eunji Lee to take care of all the administrative work.

Thank you.
The AAS-in-Asia was created to provide an academic platform dedicated to Asian scholars who cannot attend our larger annual events in North America. It was designed to be smaller in size and more geographically and financially accessible to Asianists based in Asia. Throughout the years, this initiative has grown and expanded far beyond our expectations, with host institutions in various locations of Asia such as Singapore, Taiwan, Japan, India, Thailand, and South Korea. With the rotation of the event location every year, this platform has enabled early-career scholars, and especially those from underrepresented regions and countries of Asia, to exchange knowledge, attend skill-building workshops, explore collaboration and publishing opportunities, and develop their professional network.

The 2023 AAS-in-Asia in Daegu is the 8th iteration of the AAS-in-Asia conference, happening after a two-year hiatus caused by the COVID-19 pandemic. The last AAS-in-Asia, which was in partnership with a consortium of Japanese institutions, took place entirely virtually in August 2020. Thus, Daegu is the first in-person conference since Thailand in 2019 and we are expecting more than 1,200 people from more than 40 countries with 270 scheduled panels.

The theme of the Daegu conference, “Memory, Preservation and Documentation,” has attracted an unusually high number of excellent quality panel proposals. The program committee received more than 400 applications, the most ever since the AAS-in-Asia initiative was first launched in Singapore in 2014. Our intellectual and cultural exchanges promise to be rich and fulfilling over these 4 days of conference.

I would like to thank Kyungpook National University and the Institute of Humanities Studies, in particular, for graciously hosting us this year.
Generous support that made this event possible came from the Asia-Pacific Research Center at Stanford University, the Swedish International Development Cooperation Agency, the Tang Prize Foundation, the Asian Cultural Center, the Korea Foundation, The Korea Tourism Organization, the National Research Foundation of Korea, and the Ministry of Education. AAS-in-Asia also thanks the city of Daegu for welcoming us.
Greetings.

I am Jong-hwa Lee, the Vice Mayor for Economic Affairs of Daegu. First, congratulations on the opening of the Association for Asian Studies in Asia (AAS-in-Asia) Conference, a festival for Asian studies researchers worldwide, and I welcome you on behalf of the 2.5 million citizens of Daegu.

I would like to express my deep gratitude to President Jaeseug Yun of Kyungpook National University Institute of Humanities Studies, who also serves as the Chair of the Organizing Committee, for his tremendous effort in attracting the AAS-in-Asia 2023 to Daegu. I would also like to extend my thanks to Professor Hungoo Cho, the Secretary-General, for his diligent preparations for this event. We would also like to express our gratitude and welcome all participants to this event.
Daegu, which is transforming into a high-tech city, is traditionally a city of modern humanities where historical records and experiences coexist, such as the “Archives of the National Debt Redemption Movement,” and is rich in academic, historical, and cultural resources that can be shown to participants. We hope this conference will serve as a valuable opportunity to show Korean studies’ status and the region’s humanities capabilities to participants from all over the world and spread awareness of the humanities to the Daegu’s citizens.

Lastly, I hope you have a comfortable and enjoyable time in Daegu, where scholars worldwide have gathered for the first time since the COVID-19 pandemic, and enjoy the city’s diverse culture.

Thank you.
Welcome to KNU

Welcome to KNU. I’m Wonhwa Hong, president of Kyungpook National University. On behalf of all the faculty members and students of Kyungpook National University, I would like to express my sincere gratitude that you visited our beautiful campus. Hosting this year’s AAS-in-Asia conference here in the Humanities Korea Hall is meaningful to us. This building was built by the donations of professors, students and alumni to promote humanities, which I believe fits well with the goal of the Association of Asian Studies. I am also grateful for the hard work of the members of the society who have conducted research and devoted to education even during the pandemic.

I heard that the Association for Asian Studies is the world’s largest gathering of Asian studies researchers, and it is the first face-to-face meeting held in four years. I hope this year’s conference will be memorable to all of you, sharing your research and ideas and experiencing Korean culture in Daegu. Currently, Asia is making very dynamic development, and Korea in particular continues meaningful growth in many fields. I hope that this year’s conference will make an important contribution to the development of Asian studies, which in turn will contribute to the globalization of Asian studies.
Lastly, I would like to thank the AAS board members who visited our school for the 2023 AAS-In-Asia conference and the two keynote speakers, Professor Heonik Kwon and Professor French and Julien, who gave us seminal lectures. I hope that all of you will be able to achieve what you hope to achieve during the conference period. Daegu is notorious for hot, humid and unpredictable weather. I hope you take care of your health, and I wish you and the association continued success.

Ⅰ. KNU KYUNGPOOK NATIONAL UNIVERSITY

KNU is transformed through innovation, communication, and its impression on the world.

It began as a regional education hub founded with the support of residents, and quickly gained a strong reputation as the best university south of Seoul. KNU became known for producing the top Korean intellectuals of the age, representing the Republic of Korea with pride. Our goal is to reaffirm the status long held by KNU, bringing change and the spirit of innovation to the world. We will become a university that inspires people the world over with our achievements.

We are a globally-oriented, knowledge-driven university.

We are now a global competitor; as such, we have to foster research capabilities that can compete with global standards and cultivate talent that will lead the world. KNU will be a university that not only creates knowledge but also leads the stream of intelligence as it takes a step ahead. As a university with one of the nation’s largest campuses and operating infrastructures, we strive to impress the region, the nation, and the world.

We put investment in human resources above all else.

One of our greatest assets is the people we educate. KNU will give first priority to concentrated investment in human resources development, producing talented individuals with the wisdom of cultural insight and scientific technology; passionate professionals who enjoy a challenge; people who will lead the world with creativity and innovation. In addition, we will create an educational and professional environment in which all people—students, professors, and staff of the university—trust and cooperate with each other.
II. IOHS (INSTITUTE OF HUMANITIES STUDIES)

The Institute of Humanities Studies at Kyungpook University (the Academy) was established in October 2013 and is comprised of four related institutions: the Research Center of Human Sciences (founded in 1973), the Research Center of Eastern and Western Thought, the Institute of Sino–Korean Interchange, and finally, the Open Humanities Center, which was an annexe of the College of Humanities. The merging of these four organs has a great significance.

Today, more than ever, there is a great need for interdisciplinary research and joint projects. The field of the humanities is no exception to the academic requirements of our epoch. These can be accomplished either through a metamorphosis or a branching out and instilling the essence of humanities into other domains of academia.

In line with such a goal, two academic periodicals, hitherto published separately, were combined together to form the Humanities of the East and West Journal.

On a smaller scale, this periodical means to bring together the domains of language and literature and that of history and philosophy. On a bigger scale, it also means to combine a sense of the Eastern soul with Western skills and methodologies.

These also are the aims and objectives set out by the Academy. The studies of humanities will be expanded by combining them with the knowledge of many other related fields. In particular, classical studies, which are the root of the humanities, are given particular attention. A further objective we mean to fulfil is to combine and promote humanity education with modern media. We hope that all these efforts will come to fruition.
III. ASSOCIATION FOR ASIAN STUDIES

The Association for Asian Studies (AAS) is a scholarly, non-political, non-profit professional association, open to all persons interested in Asia. With 7,000 members worldwide, representing all the regions and countries of Asia and all academic disciplines across the humanities and social sciences, the AAS is the largest organization of its kind. AAS membership has seen an increasing number of scholars from Asia crossing the Pacific to attend AAS annual conferences. Responding to this trend, the AAS Board of Directors enthusiastically endorsed the idea to have AAS conferences in Asia in partnership with local institutes and universities. The AAS-in-Asia does not replace the large annual conference held each spring in North America. This conference gives our members and others interested in Asian Studies, who are unable to attend the Annual Conferences held in North America, the opportunity to participate on panel sessions and network with colleagues in a more intimate setting. Although smaller in size, these conferences include the same exciting features as the Annual Conference, including special sessions, keynote speakers, book exhibits and receptions.

Research Publications of the Asia Culture Museum

- Themed Research Report
Since its opening in 2015, the Asia Culture Museum has published about forty-five types of reports. Asia Plus was originally published in 2018 as a commercial public education book to promote the diversity of Asian culture, but in 2022 it was changed into a research report in which ACC researchers conduct studies together with domestic and foreign professional researchers and publish the results.

- Visiting Researcher Report
The Crossing Asia series was first published as a commercial public education book in 2020 by selecting excellent papers by visiting scholars at the ACC. In 2022, it was changed into a form of report, and ten reports have been published so far.

- Book
The ACC mainly publishes public education books about Asian culture and arts. It published twenty-two books from 2018 to 2022, including exhibition catalogs, humanities works on Asian culture and arts written by the winners of writing competition, translations of books, and excellent reports by visiting researchers, all of which are available for sale.

- Voice Book
The Voice Book is a digital audio book made by using the ACC's Asian culture and art research publications. First released in 2019, two or three voice books are now produced each year. In addition, to increase social access to the enjoyment of culture for the blind and the disabled, we cooperate with other regional agencies including the Gwangju Braille Library.

TANG PRIZE LECTURE
STANFORD UNIVERSITY ROUNDTABLE
KNU ROUNDTABLE 1 SPONSORED BY KOREA FOUNDATION
KNU ROUNDTABLE 2 SPONSORED BY KOREA FOUNDATION
KNU ROUNDTABLE 3 SPONSORED BY KOREA FOUNDATION
On the special occasion of this Tang Prize Lecture, Professor Wang Gungwu will reflect on one of the conference’s themes “Memory” by drawing on his memoirs in his: Home is Not Here and Home is Where We Are. This lecture will take us through the unexpected turns and wondrous meanders of a unique life fashioned by homes newly found and constructed across many continents. As major events are shaping the history of China, Southeast Asia and the world, this journey is a self-reflection on one’s identity and one that finds resonances through the infinite voices and feelings of belonging of the Chinese diaspora. Professor’s Wang’s lecture will be followed by a conversation with AAS President Jean Oi, who will help him “unpick and explain” the echoes that reverberate from the “grand and even intimidating universe” that is the past.

In recent years, the bilateral and trilateral relations among China, Japan, and South Korea have soured. Japan and S. Korea continue to fight over historical issues and Japan and S. Korea face increasing security dilemmas in the midst of rising tensions between China and the United States. The annual trilateral summit has not occurred since 2019. The panel will critically assess the status of the bilateral and trilateral relations among China, Japan, and South Korea and discuss how they can improve their relations at this critical juncture.
Ever since letters appear in human history, recording by letters is not only a crucial factor for the prosperity of human societies built on information production, processing, distribution, but also it works as a mean of transmission of human experience and history. Throughout the history of recording, paper has been an icon for creativity and innovation. However, considering that paper only became popular 1500 years ago in the history of man, the researches on the era before paper depends on some excavated non-paper recording materials; before invention of paper, wooden tablets had been an important mean of writing and recording. Therefore, about a million wooden tablets excavated from Korea, China and Japan are crucial data for research on history of ancient East Asia. In session 1, we will inspect the previous researches on restoration of East Asian history based on the wooden tablets excavated from Korea, China and Japan. we will also talk about the true nature of the cultural and political network to open a new horizon of understanding of East Asian history.

Paper Title 1
Status and Prospects of East Asian Wooden Tablet Research at Kyungpook National University's HK+ project Unit

Abstract

The HK+ Project Team at the Institute of Humanities Studies in Kyungpook National University is conducting research on the origins of record culture by tracing the roots of record culture focusing on the ‘木簡(Wooden Tablet)’, a record medium, which can be considered a East Asian humanities platform that records Chinese characters. The main purpose is to cover the roots of East Asian record culture that were connected under mutual influence through a comparison of excavated wooden records from Korea, China, and Japan. The research project has already completed the first stage (2019-2021) with the theme "Basic Research for Exploring the Origins of East Asian Record Culture", and is currently conducting the second stage (2022-2026) with the theme "In-depth Research on the Origins of East Asian Record Culture and Intellectual Network". Various research achievements, including the publication of the “Comprehensive Compilation of East Asian Wooden Tablet” (six volumes), were released to the academic community based on previous research. In addition, in preparation for the production of the East Asian wooden Tablet database and search platform, approximately 1 million Korean, Chinese, and Japanese wooden tablet materials have been sorted and classified, and the website ‘East Asian Wooden Tablet Dictionary’(eawd.knu.ac.kr) is currently being operated. This will be utilized as an open platform in the future, and the “East Asian Wooden Tablet Dictionary” will be published after content selection and editing. In the future, the team plans to continue to pursue activities such as producing research results related to the agenda, hosting domestic and international academic conferences, promoting interpersonal exchanges among researchers, and offering courses to foster the next generation of scholars. Through these efforts, the team hopes to overcome borders and contribute to leading East Asian regional research, complementing the bias of national history and leading Korea as the core base of East Asian cultural research.

KEUM JAE WON
KYUNGPOOK NATIONAL UNIVERSITY

Keum Jae Won is currently a HK Research Professor at the Institute of Humanities Studies, Kyungpook National University. He specializes in ancient Chinese history (Qin–Han period), historical geography and paleography, the bamboo and wooden manuscripts. After obtaining his bachelor’s and master’s degrees in Oriental History from the Department of History at Kyungpook National University in 2009, he worked as a visiting researcher at the Institute of History, Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. He obtained his doctorate in History from Peking University, specializing in ancient Chinese history, from 2011–2015. From 2015–2021, he worked as an associate professor at the School of History, Northwest University, China.
Abstract

It is evident that there has been a long history of using bamboo and wooden slips as usual medium of writing in China. It seems likely that it was not until the middle of the third, or even the end of the fourth century that paper had taken a predominant place over bamboo and wood, and become the principal medium of writing. According to historical records, material remains of bamboo and wooden documents used for administrative purposes extend to the Jin periods, but these material objects hardly survived. Discovery of bamboo and wooden manuscripts is really a major archaeological event of China in the 20th century. Since the early 20th century, more than 400,000 pieces of inscribed bamboo and wooden slips, which date from the period of Warring States to the Wei-Jin Dynasties, have been found in various parts of China. Most of these can be dated to the Qin and Han Dynasties.

The huge number of inscribed bamboo and wooden slips from northwest frontier beacon, post sites, tombs and ancient wells are valuable first-hand information of ancient people. Which helps to confirm the reliability of historical records, correct historical records error, supplement historical records and expand the field of history study, enabling us to constantly approach the real historical world.

Bamboo and wooden manuscripts are usually classified into two categories: books and documents. Among them, the bamboo documents accounted for about eighty percent that date from the Warring States, Qin, Western Han, Eastern Han, Three Kingdoms, Wei and Jin period, includes official documents such as the government administrative archives, law, registers, accounts, case records, judicial documents, certificates and passports, seals and labels; and private documents such as letters, wills and funerary objects lists. Official and private bamboo documents played an important role in the national administrative activities and people’s daily life at that time, and most of them has not been found in the literature handed down from ancient times, is no substitute for first-hand information. Their unique historical value lies in supplementing and providing rich information regarding administrative procedures, official document system, land system, tax system, household registration system, official system, title system, law and justice, garrison system, weaponry and military facilities, hotel and post house, accounting and financial system, historical geography, etc..

The objects of unearthed bamboo and silk books are of great significance to study the system of ancient Chinese books, which make us have a more in-depth understanding of creation, form, reading, interpretation, selection and elimination, propagation and preservation, classification of ancient books. Extensive contents of bamboo and silk books cover Confucianism, Taoism, Mohism, Yi-ology, Yin-Yang School, Military Strategist, Poetry, Philology, Arithmetic, Divination, Natural Science, Medicine, and other fields, which are of great significance to the intellectual history studies, contribute to the reconstruction and recovery the structure and system of knowledge in ancient times. Promoting research on philology, detection of forgeries and collation of ancient books, history, literature, medicine, mathematics, early Confucian history, Taoism and divination, reconstruction of the academic history of Pre–Qin and Qin-Han, the intellectual history of ancient China will be rewritten in a large extent.

Overall, the unearthed bamboo and wooden slips reveal the strict legal system, efficient document administration, trustworthy contract society, colorful daily life, devout belief world, developed academic culture, and historical features different from those recorded in historical books in ancient China.
Abstract

A mokkan is a wooden slip on which characters are inscribed after it has been trimmed. In ancient times, Koreans communicated with others by leaving notes or their thoughts on such mokkan (wooden slips). Contrary to China where slips are divided into zhujian (竹簡, bamboo slips) and mudu (木牘, wooden tablets), bamboo slips were rare in Korea. Korean mokkan are rectangular in shape which is in keeping with that of Japanese wooden slips.

However, while multi-sided wooden slips have been discovered in Korea, very less ones have been unearthed in Japan. This was designed to heighten convenience when studying scriptures or preparing documents. The characteristics of Korean wooden slips can be attributed to the traditional method of communication that existed even before the introduction of Chinese characters. The mokkan culture of ancient Korea was as such a combination of the conventional communication method using pieces of wood and the Chinese character system.

Approximately 700 mokkan have been discovered to date. These were used as scriptures, documents, tags, rituals, memos, and for practice purposes. In keeping with this wide range of uses, various types of Korean mokkan were produced. Although the mokkan discovered to date were produced solely within the borders of Lelang Commandery of the Han dynasty, Baekje, and Silla, the possibility of mokkan produced in Koguryeo, Gaya, and Parhae being discovered in the future cannot be ruled out altogether.
Interest in ancient Korean mokkan has increased and a significant number of studies have also accumulated. There are differing opinions regarding the wooden slips found at Seongsan Mt. Fortress in Haman, and more specifically in terms of the word noin (奴人) recorded on the mokkan and the tax burden of nobi (奴婢). Meanwhile, mokkan discovered in Bogam-ri, Naju, shed some light on the nature of the ruling system of Baekje in local areas during the early seventh century. The human-shaped one found in the reservoir complex at Hwawang Fortress in Changnyeong, was used to conduct a ritual ceremony for the dragon king (yongwang). However, different opinions have emerged as to whether the purpose of the ritual ceremony was to pray for rain or to cure diseases.

Rather than being compiled by later generations, Korean ancient mokkan are historical materials that were prepared by people who lived during the actual period being depicted. Furthermore, the contents of these mokkan help to shed some light on the state of affairs at the time and the intentions of the composer. A more profound understanding of ancient society in Korea can be secured when more materials are accumulated and classified by type and purposes of use, an endeavor that will be made possible by a perspective embracing all of East Asian mokkan, and interdisciplinary studies in related fields are developed and implemented.
Abstract

Wooden strips with ink writing known as mokkan have been recovered in the hundreds of thousands from sites around Japan dating to the so-called ancient period, roughly equivalent to the seventh and eighth centuries. Of these, however, only about 10% date to the period prior to the establishment of the Nara capital in 710. The pace with which writing as a technology spread during the eighth century can be easily grasped through the distribution of mokkan sites throughout the archipelago that date to that time, but the picture is less clear for the seventh century. This presentation highlights seventh-century mokkan, beginning with the earliest mokkan associated with capitals in Naniwa, Asuka, and Ōmi, and then focusing on those mokkan recovered from sites far outside the capital region. Despite vast distances and some localization, important shared features of mokkan usage and inscriptive practice suggest sustained connections between center and peripheries, as well as among “peripheral” literate communities throughout Japan. In this presentation, I argue that seventh-century mokkan, when compared to those of the eighth century, attest to the importance of peninsular migrants as both scribes and teachers in the earliest manifestation of written culture in Japan. Through a focus on document mokkan, I show how certain features of the “vernacularization” of document forms are shared among mokkan from early Korea and Japan, and in this context, I emphasize that the beginnings of written culture in Japan must be understood in connection with the fall of Paekche and the unification of the southern part of the Korean peninsula under Silla rule in the 670s.
Panel Description

In the studies of world recording culture, paper has been an icon for creativity and innovation. But, the production of recordings completely depended on hand-writing, which consequently restricted the mass transmission and distribution of information. To redeem the issue, mass printing whose types were made out of mud, wood and metal were exploited. Thus, the true meaning of recording starts from putting paper, types and ink together. Thus, in session2, we will talk about the history and prior relations of the most important printing materials and its meaning. Specifically, we will talk about the Korean Baegun Hwasang Chorok Buljo Jisimcheyoeol as well as Nanmingquan Song Zhengdaoge, which were 78 and 216 years prior to the Gutenberg’s metal printing in 1455. We will talk about the change in the style of the Chinese character and its historical significance on the history of printing culture.

PRESENTER
UNESCO INTERNATIONAL CENTER FOR DOCUMENTARY HERITAGE

PRESENTER BIO
Noh Ji Young is a Programme Specialist in Research & Development Division of UNESCO’s International Centre for Documentary Heritage (ICDH). She holds a master’s degree in Archival and Information Sciences and is a certified National Archivist. Her primary research focuses on archival curation, which led to her master’s thesis, “A study on the role of archives and archivists in the era of industry 4.0: Focusing on DCC curation lifecycle model.” As her research interests expanded, Jiyoung strives to discover and develop effective ways to utilize documentary heritage on a global scale while also playing a key role in coordinating the joint international research program ‘From Jikji to Gutenberg’ and overseeing the development of the monitoring system for the UNESCO Memory of the World programme.

Abstract
From Jikji to Gutenberg initiative is a long-term project that spans from 2022 to 2027, with funding from the National Endowment for Humanities (NEH) in the United States, the Overseas Korean Cultural Heritage Foundation (OKCHF), and UNESCO International Centre for Documentary Heritage (ICDH). The initiative began as a collaboration between J. Marriott Library at the University of Utah and UNESCO ICDH, and has since grown to involve museums and educational institutions worldwide, such as the Smithsonian Museum & Gallery, Library of Congress, and Princeton University Scheide Library, as well as a team of researchers from various fields related to documentary heritage and bibliographical history.

This team of researchers, including historians, scientists, and conservators, is conducting ongoing studies and investigations to discover new evidence on both Eastern and Western printing culture. The project is actively engaged in global conferences, publications, and scientific experiments. For example, in 2022, a team of scientists and staff members of ICDH gathered more than 60 pieces of early printings from both the Western and Eastern world to conduct chemical mapping through XRF (X-ray Fluorescence) and XANES methods at SLAC National Laboratory’s Synchrotron Radiation Lightsource.
The team is still in the process of analyzing the data, but the project has already garnered attention from press media worldwide, including NBC, Wired Magazine, and C-Net.

In 2023, a team of over 50 scholars and researchers from more than 16 countries gathered in-person for the first time at the Library of Congress to share knowledge and experience on the early printing culture and history as part of a scholarly colloquium. The ultimate goal of this project is to publish an extensive catalog in 2025 and open a worldwide exhibition in 2027. The catalog will comprise scientific and historical research and analysis on two UNESCO Memory of the World inscriptions, Jikji and the Gutenberg Bible, along with related early printing cultures of both the Western and Eastern world. The exhibition will be opened in museums and libraries in different cities worldwide, showcasing a 42-line Gutenberg Bible and other early printed materials related to the history of printing cultures, displayed alongside an earlier Korean book printed from cast-metal type. The project is a groundbreaking initiative that aims to shed light on the similarities and differences between Eastern and Western printing culture, providing valuable insights into the history and development of printing technologies.
Paper Title 2

Discovery and Evidence of the World’s Oldest Metal Type Printing Book: The Song of Enlightenment (南明泉和尚頌證道歌) from Goryeo Dynasty of Korea in 1239

Abstract

It has been well known that the metal type printing technique was invented in the Goryeo (高麗) dynasty of Korea in the early 13th century. According to written history document, 28 copies of Sangjeongyemun (詳定古今禮文) were printed with movable metal type between 1234 and 1241. The original version of The Song of Enlightenment (南明泉和尚頌證道歌) with Commentaries by Buddhist Monk Nammyeong Cheon was also printed using metal type. Jikji (直指), the oldest extant metal printed book in the world, was printed in 1377 as recognized by the UNESCO Memory of the World program. Six nearly identical versions of an ancient printed book, The Song of Enlightenment (南明泉和尚頌證道歌) published in 1239 from the Goryeo dynasty of Korea in Korean and English. He has been presenting his findings for public awareness and to promote the recognition, duly earned, by monumental world documents for the culture heritage of mankind.

However, it was extremely hard to reach a consensus due to the subjective nature of ancient book examination by historians, bibliographers and conservators. To conclude this heated debate with firm scientific evidence, all six versions of The Song of Enlightenment were examined by image comparisons of individual characters, lines of characters, pages and borderlines to determine whether they are the identical versions, using the same woodblocks, or different versions from different techniques in different times.
All claims raised against the possibility of metal type printing of the particular book (Gongin (空印) version, designated as a Korean treasure in 2012) were reviewed thoroughly in terms of paper, shapes of printed characters, printing characteristics and differences with other versions. Very clear circumstantial and physical evidence for metal type printing of the Gongin version was found. It was confirmed to have more than metal casting defects, including, the lightest ink tone of printed characters, and the smallest inked area (characters with thin strokes) among all six versions. The Gongin version was very likely printed using movable metal type in September 1239, as indicated in the imprint. It is definitely the world’s oldest extant book, printed using metal type in Korea in 1239, predating Jikji (1377) by 138 years and the 42-line Gutenberg Bible (~1455) by 216 years. The results of image-based biblio-forensic study, together with bibliographic history analysis, strongly point out the fact that the version of interest is the world’s oldest metal-type printed book, printed in September 1239. Evidence will be reported and discussed in detail. The computer aided, image analysis-based biblio-forensic study lead the closure of 50 year-long debates among Korean academics, and the discovery of the world’s oldest metal-type printed book to be recognized as the cultural heritage of mankind.
Birth of the Joseon Dynasty version of Ming typeface (1684-1884)

Abstract

In the late Joseon Dynasty, the Ming typeface was birthed in the heyday of printing technology. However, it is still being determined when, where, who, or what it was developed for because there was no research on the Ming type in Korea. This basic proposal has just been revealed in Korean printing history today.

To solve the above-unexplained problem, research and verification were conducted from 1664 to 1884 using 1,140 pieces of “Mun-jib (Anthology)” digital archive data stored in Korea, Japan, and the United States. “Gyoseo-gwan’s Ming-type books” were selected and classified into five periods.

In the 200 years of the late Joseon Dynasty, the classification of the existing first half (1684-1723) and the second half (1724-1884) as the character classification method of the “Joseon Ming type Book List” (121 books) was too broad in the study of character change.

Therefore, the following five periods were divided into five periods by empirical verification of the collection of literature published in Ming type. The first period was divided from 1684 to 1720. The second period was from 1720 to 1741. The third period was from 1741 to 1776. The fourth period was from 1776 to 1800. The fifth period was divided from 1800 to 1884. Additionally, 27 “Mun-jib” of representative literature were chosen from the “List of Representative Literature” found in different Ming types.
Seven characters ‘十(Ten),’ ‘人(people),’ ‘山(mountain),’ ‘之(of),’ ‘也(also),’ ‘以(with),’ ‘心(heart)’ were added and compiled into a “Representative character analysis table” to compare and analyze representative characters in the time series, seven characters were added and compiled into a “Representative character analysis table.” A seven-character usual character analysis policy was established, and a comparative analysis was conducted.

As mentioned above, we extracted the characteristics of the constituent elements of characters, such as changes in line thickness, the angle and length of strokes, the relationship between strokes and strokes, and the division ratio between vertical and horizontal strokes. We judged whether the character shape had been improved. Could you bring out the number of print development?

As a result, it is a discovery that the development of five types produced in the late Joseon Dynasty and two types made by individuals have been confirmed. As mentioned above, the late Joseon Dynasty was a peak period when printing technology was concentrated, and it is new knowledge that the Ming type was birthed here.
Paper Title 4

The development and dissemination of Juzhen Imitation Song Typeface and its historical significance

Abstract

Juzhen Imitation Song Typeface is highly recognizable and aesthetically pleasing, and is widely considered one of the most successful metal movable typefaces. It is also the origin of the Imitation Song Typeface (known as “soutyoutai” in Japan) in both China and Japan. However, despite its significant influence, research on Juzhen Imitation Song Typeface has been extremely limited, and there are still many crucial details that need to be explored. These seemingly insignificant details are indispensable for summarizing the font development experience and studying the evolution of the font.

The research study is based on the history of printing fonts and the specific era, and aims to clarify important issues such as the development process, the required technical skills for producing molds, the composition of the character family of the Juzhen Imitation Song Typeface, and how it was used and disseminated, particularly in Japan. Juzhen Imitation Song Typeface was developed by Ding Sanzai and other intellectuals who were dedicated to preserving traditional historical concepts in typography. By creating this typeface, they aimed to revive the traditional Chinese aesthetic spirit and express the essence of Chinese culture. The typeface combined the traditional Chinese engraving and printing techniques with new movable type technology, opening up a new era of metal movable typeface. Its significant contributions to the development of the Imitation Song Typeface system have earned it a milestone position in the East Asian Chinese character culture circle.
Abstract

“Dancing with Jikji” (Jikji Code) is a feature documentary that uses early print history as a vehicle to explore the questions of Eurocentrism and its consequence, the ancient cultural exchanges between East & West, and the meaning of the truth in history. Despite Jikji being recognized by UNESCO as the world’s oldest movable metal type book, the main character, David Redman finds the staff of the French National Library have no knowledge of Jikji housed in the institution. Realizing Eurocentrism is at play, he sets off on a journey of discovery that includes his own learned Eurocentric view of history. The film’s main findings include proof of the cultural exchange between Vatican’s monks to Korea prior to 1333, 14th century Vatican monk’s letters that mention print, a Roman Catholic Archbishop in Beijing in the 13th century, a movable metal type printer in Avignon prior to Gutenberg and a reference of an example of printed money in Europe in the early 14th century.

The author is currently proposing a new documentary to explore questions about ‘The Song of Enlightenment:’ Is the Gongin Version the oldest extant movable metal print book? Why have some historians not looked at this question seriously, especially in Korea? Did this early 13th century technology influence European developments two centuries later? The proposed documentary would follow the controversy from the 8th AAS-in-Asia Conference in Daegu, Korea and as “The Song of Enlightenment” gains more interest world-wide. This project will take a step further into the exploration of Eurocentrism and Ethnocentrism as well as key reasons why people often deny new facts. These key reasons of denial may provide new insight into Eurocentrism and Ethnocentrism.
Panel Description

The Korean Wave, once dismissed as a passing trend only in Asia, has now firmly established itself as a global phenomenon with more than two decades of popularity. Initially known as Hallyu 1.0 and beginning around 1997, it has since evolved into Hallyu 2.0 as described by Dal-young Jin. The current state of the Korean Wave in the post-BTS and post-Squid Game era, is even more difficult to define due to the rapidly changing mediascape of K-dramas and K-pop music videos driven by insatiable consumer demand. New K-dramas are released weekly, if not daily, across a variety of streaming platforms such as Netflix, Disney+, Apple TV, Watcha, and Wavve. This panel aims to take a moment to reflect on the ever-evolving Hallyu 3.0 landscape and explore its diverse genres, artistic forms, and industries by inviting papers from leading scholars and writers in the field.

The Korean Popular Culture Class beyond Borders: Fandom, Korean Studies and Media Literacy

PRESENTER BIO

Abstract
Since the 1990s, the Korean Wave (Hallyu), which refers to the popularity of Korean popular culture overseas, has become an even bigger wave that has surpassed the storm in a teacup as of 2022, after going through the era of COVID-19. Korean popular culture courses have become popular classes offered in various foreign universities out of South Korea since 2010 when Hallyu began to gain recognition not only in Asia but also in Europe and North America. Recently, media literacy has been emphasized in Korean educational institutions, leading to the opening of courses related to media in addition to the study of Korean popular culture.

This presentation will examine the changes and current status of Korean popular culture courses both domestically and internationally. The speaker will discuss the limitations and possibilities of Hallyu courses from the perspective of fandom, Korean studies, and media literacy through various forms of Hallyu courses that he has taught as a lecturer and curriculum developer. First, the presentation will compare and contrast a Korean popular culture course offered as a Korean studies subject through the Asian Studies major at a university in the U.S. (2015-2016) and a course taught in English as a liberal arts course with international students and Korean students at a university in South Korea (2019). The presentation will also discuss the potential of Hallyu courses as an introductory course on the entertainment industry that encompasses media literacy, using two examples: a Korean entertainment industry course in Korean at a high school in South Korea as a pre-college program (2019) and a course taught at Hongik University as a special interdisciplinary course on practical projects, where students performed K-pop marketing and film adaptation projects with mentoring from marketing experts and current film producers (2022 & 2023).
Paper Title 2
Cultural Hybridity and Appropriation In K-Pop

Abstract

K-Pop began as a part of Korean local popular music in the late 1990s, but has become a global popular music genre firstly in East Asia since the early 2000s then even outside East Asia since the early 2010s. Especially, after the big success of BTS and other bands in the late 2010s K-Pop is considered one of the hottest rising musical genres in the world.

In the beginning when K-Pop was developed as a specific musical genre in Korea, it mostly referred to US and Japanese popular music both musically and industrially. Musically, K-Pop referred to R&B, Hip Hop and electronic dance music from US and enka and J-Pop from Japan. Industrially, the unique business model of K-Pop usually called ‘agency-idol system’ supported by ‘total management strategy’ was highly influenced by the star system of Hollywood movie studios in the early 20C and the factory processing of Motown in the 1960s as well as by Japanese idol industry in the 1980s and 1990s. It means K-Pop is basically a result of cultural hybridization between local and global.

Recently, K-Pop is accepting other cultures as well as human resources from different parts of the world, which makes its hybridity deeper and more significant. International players including musicians, composers and producers are now essential parts of K-Pop and industrial collaboration between Korea and other countries is increasing. Also, other countries are using K-Pop as their reference to create their own music. However, in this procedure, sometimes unexpected conflicts happen including cultural appropriation and nationalism controversies. It shows the ambivalent aspect of K-Pop that it is becoming more and more dependent upon global popular music scene but still cannot be separated from its locality as being Korean.
Reimagining Decolonized Futures: The South Korean Mediascape of Science Fiction and Fantasy

Abstract
Over the past decade, science fiction and fantasy have experienced a remarkable surge in popularity within the South Korean mediascape. This shift is noteworthy, given that these genres have historically been regarded as non-serious and degraded forms of literature in South Korea, often associated with children’s science education rather than serious fiction. With the proliferation of global streaming platforms, webtoons, and web-novels, science fiction and fantasy have now come to occupy a prominent position in the country’s cultural landscape.

This paper examines three key characteristics of South Korean science fiction and fantasy (SFF) films and television dramas, focusing on three notable absences that have shaped the evolution of these genres: (1) the absence of science fiction due to past genre categorization issues and techno-nationalistic policies; (2) the absence of imagined futures within science fiction and fantasy narratives; and (3) the absence of decolonized future visions. The analysis reveals that South Korean SFF often employs time-travel narratives that return to the past rather than envisioning the future. Moreover, when future scenarios are imagined, they frequently depict South Korea as remaining under the control of Western or other neo-imperial powers. In this regard, this paper argues for the importance of fostering a decolonized and non-techno-nationalistic vision of the future within South Korean SFF. By reimagining the future, these genres can contribute to the ongoing cultural and political discourse in South Korea and offer new perspectives on the nation’s history and identity.
Paper Title 4
The Rise of Webtoons: The Impact of Digital Mega-Platforms on Korean Comics Culture

Abstract

“Webtoon,” a term coined in South Korea during the early 2000s by amalgamating “web” and “cartoon,” represents a unique category of digital comics. They are set apart from “digital comics” or “webcomics” by their distinguishing features, which include a vertical scrolling format and optimization for mobile devices. As a significant part of the Korean Wave, they have contributed to the growth of digital media in both local and global creative industries.

This paper seeks to understand the emergence of Webtoons as a mainstream popular culture phenomenon in Korea, despite the traditionally limited influence of comics in comparison to Japan and the United States. To this end, this paper examines the role of digital webtoon platforms such as Naver Webtoon and KakaoPage in shaping the Korean comics culture and broader media ecology. These platforms have introduced transformative features including partial free distribution, enhanced communication between readers and artists, artist incubation systems, agile profit policies, and transmedia production. As a result, Webtoon platforms and creators are developing innovative content tailored for online and mobile consumption, adapting to various visual media formats such as movies and TV dramas, and generating significant revenue through intellectual property rights. This presentation offers a critical analysis of the birth and continuous evolution of Webtoons within the context of media structural administration, emphasizing the significance of platform-driven societies in shaping contemporary popular culture.

Kim Bo Young is a leading South Korean science fiction writer whose works have significantly influenced numerous emerging authors since the early 2000s. Kim made her debut with "The Experience of Touch," which won the inaugural Science Technology Creative Fiction Novella Award of Korea in 2004. Kim's literary accomplishments include numerous accolades, such as the Grand Prize at the first Annual Korean SF Novel Award for "The Seven Executioners" and the fifth Grand Prize at the first Annual Korean SF Novella Award for "How Alike Are We."

Kim’s short story “Evolutionary Myths” was featured in the American science fiction magazine Clarkesworld, while her short story collection I’m Waiting For You and Other Stories was published in English by HarperCollins in the US and UK. Additionally, Kim’s translated short story collection On the Origin of Species and Other Stories, published by Kaya Press, was nominated for a National Book Award, and her work Whale Snows Down was nominated for the SFF Rosetta Award. Prior to her literary debut, Kim worked as a video game scenario writer and producer for the game developer team Garam and Baram.

Abstract

Rooted in a strong secular pragmatic culture, South Korean literature has historically prioritized accurate representation of historical remains and facts, while deemphasizing fantastical elements. As a result, science fiction has traditionally been viewed as a tool for popularizing science, rather than as a literary genre. This tendency to downplay fantasticity and fictionality is exemplified by the recent publication of Ursula K. Le Guin and Joanna Russ’s essays and interviews, with a notable absence of their fictional works. This trend highlights a prevailing understanding and consumption of science fiction as a vehicle for progressive thought, rather than as a literary genre for social critique and imagination.

Nevertheless, given the historical marginalization of science fiction in Korean literary history, the genre holds the potential to become a platform for minority voices and social issues. Recent developments in the Korean literary landscape have seen a growing appreciation for female science fiction writers, including not only international figures like Le Guin and Margaret Atwood, but also domestic writers such as Djuna, Choyeop Kim, Bora Chung, and Serang Chung. This trend has led to a rising number of young, predominantly female, readers engaging with the genre as a progressive, feminist form of literature, although this should not be considered its exclusive purpose.

Another factor shaping the Korean science fiction literary landscape is the limitations of the Korean language market, which has traditionally pressured writers to avoid niche markets and standardize literary ideas for wider appeal. However, the emergence of global streaming services and the growing global status of Korean literature offer new opportunities for Korean science fiction writers to reach broader audiences in the world thus explore diverse themes. In this regard, this paper will examine the current trends and future prospects for the genre in Korea, taking into account the cultural, historical, and market forces at play.

Daechwita

Korean traditional orchestral music (Breath of the Wilderness)

Daechwita is a traditional Korean marching song. It was played during the march of kings and dignitaries, the hospitality of noble men, the hospitality of foreign envoys, and the march and improvement of the army. The music starts and ends according to the chant of the deungchae, which acts as a conductor. The free rhythm of the Taepyeongso, the commanding tone of the nagak and nabal, and the resonance of the percussion instruments harmonize to show a cheerful and lofty spirit.

We live by eating grains grown on this land, stepping on the ground, and breathing together in nature. I hope that this song will give you an opportunity to think about the preciousness of nature and the environment while drawing a plain that is magnificent and full of spirit like a wide plain.

Heonik Kwon has done fieldwork both in a small-scale indigenous society (among nomadic reindeer hunter-herders in Far East Siberia, during the last years of the Soviet order) and in places of large-scale historical upheavals such as the postwar central Vietnam. Serving as a Senior Research Fellow in Social Science and Distinguished Professor of Social Anthropology at Trinity College, University of Cambridge, he is also part of the Mega-Asia research group at Seoul National University Asia Center. A Fellow of the British Academy, Kwon’s previous books include: Ghosts of War in Vietnam (2008, winner of Kahin Prize), The Other Cold War (2010), After the Korean War: An Intimate History (2020, Palais Prize), and Spirit Power: Politics and Religion in Korea’s American Century (2022, co-authored with Jun Hwan Park). He is now completing a book on Korean War memories in global spectrum.

Remembering the 1951–1953 War in Korea

Abstract

It is my true honor to be given this opportunity to address this great gathering. Especially so since this town is where I spent all my early school years. I grew up next to Camp Walker, and the schools I attended were all a stone’s throw away from Camp Henry, another prominent US military base existing in Daegu. I mentioned this in a recent interview during which I was asked how I came to take interest in Cold War history in the first place, somewhat uniquely as an anthropologist. That is, many years before I crossed in 1990 the then-existing Iron Curtain to undertake my first fieldwork in a remote place of the former Soviet Union. So I thank the AAS and the host of this conference for inviting me back to this place where all seem to have started for me and my career.
Daegu takes up an important place in the history and heritage of the Korean War, the subject of my small contribution today. On the side of history, the river that surrounds the town along its northern reach, Nakdong River, is prominent. This is where in the early days of the 1950–1953 war the South Korean and the US forces confronted their stronger, then-triumphant antagonist, North Korea’s People’s Army. The gruesome reality on this battlefield in the summer of 1950 comes quite close to what we know of the Korean War as a civil war or a fratricidal war—with an added complication that a large number of the People’s Army forces were then South Korean youth and students conscripted from the territory of the Republic of Korea under their occupation. The condition of this reality, a stagnant frontline that claimed countless lives, was also akin to that of one of the best known episodes of modern warfare—the trench war of 1914–1918. Another major standoff developed during the later days of the war—this time, near the 38th Parallel and especially along the central highlands of the Korean peninsula where the United Nations forces confronted the Chinese and North Korean forces.

A major crisis of the early Cold War, the Korean War was therefore much more than a civil war. It was also an international conflict fought between, among others, two of the most powerful nations of the contemporary world, the United States and the People’s Republic of China. Remarkably, the legacies of this war continue to shape the geopolitical conditions in East Asia and beyond. In my earlier work, After the Korean War: An Intimate History (2020), I explored the question of how to creatively remember the destruction of Korea’s civil war. This question was also the subject of my earlier appearance to the AAS-in-Asia, the Kyoto meeting in 2014. On this occasion, allow me to raise the same question in relation to the war’s historical reality as an international and global conflict. The focus will be on sites of the Hill Fight (1951–1953) in the central highlands, between Chinese and North Korean forces, on the one hand, and on the other, the United Nations forces. Describing South Korea’s ongoing initiative of MIA (Missing In Action) accounting activities on these old battlegrounds, I will explore how public actions concerning the remains of war are closely intertwined with changing geopolitical conditions, regional and global. This will be followed by some thoughts on preserving these places as a meaningful heritage site for Asia’s peacible future and as critical commentary on the geopolitics of war—namely, in alignment with this conference’s overarching theme of “Asia in Motion: Memory, Preservation and Documentation.”
The Korean War Remains

The Army of the Republic of Korea initiated a Korean War KIA/MIA (Killed in Action/Missing in Action) accounting programme in the lead-up to the fiftieth anniversary of the Korean War in 2000. Initially a modest project, by the end of the 2000s, the programme became firmly established as a distinct and worthy public policy, attracting intense public interest. The hugely popular war film, The Brotherhood of War (2004, also known as Taegŭkgi, South Korea’s national flag) played a considerable role in generating public interest in the Army’s Korean War MIA mission. The film starts and ends with a moving scene of (post-mortem) brotherly reunion at an excavation site. The encounter is between an elderly veteran and his long-missing elder brother killed in action on a hill as an officer of the North Korea’s elite shock-troops.¹

I joined the mission’s forensic anthropological taskforce in 2007 as an external advisor. This was when the previously army-managed modest activity was upgraded in status and scale and subsequently transferred to the mandate of South Korea’s Ministry of National Defence. Since then, the mission’s official title has become the Ministry of National Defence Agency for KIA Recovery and Identification (henceforth, Korean KIA recovery mission). The Korean Killed In Action mission has since covered nearly all of the major battlegrounds of the Korean War (within the territory of South Korea), starting from the Nakdong parameter, where the South Korean and US forces confronted North Korea’s strong People’s Army (KPA) in the early days of the war, from July to September 1950. Later the mission concentrated on sites of vicious hill fights in the central region. This is where South Korean, US and other UN forces confronted the Chinese and North Korean forces, following China’s intervention in the Korean War in October 1950. It was a war of attrition whose condition was akin to the trench warfare of 1914–1918 in northern France. The hill fight lasted until the very last day of the Korean War on July 27, 1953. This is where the drama of The Brotherhood of War unfolds: it is also the background of South Korea’s another popular war film, Hill Fights (Gojijŏn, 2011), which features dreadful fights over the hills between the two Korean forces. In the cinematic history of the Korean War, the hill fights have long been a favorite subject. The important war film of the earlier era, titled The Marines Who Never Returned (Dolaoji atnŭn haebŭng, 1963), for instance, takes these hill fights as its dramatic, concluding episode, although here the fight is between Chinese troops and their outnumbered South Korean antagonists.

Modelled on the American MIA/POW accounting agency, the Korean taskforce later collaborated with the US agencies and other former UN allies, such as Belgium. It briefly expanded its activity to Vietnam in 2015 (concerning Korean MIAs in the second Indochina war). There was even a discussion to collaborate with the North Korean counterpart on the surveying of the Demilitarized Zone, the heavily fortified borderland between the two Koreas. However, the most notable aspect of the external activity of Korean KIA and MIA accounting involved China. In 2014, the remains of the Chinese volunteer soldiers to the Korean War that had been discovered as part of South Korea’s search-and-find activities began to be repatriated to their homeland, mostly to a designated place in Shenyang.

The last initiative subsequently became a notable event in the history of war commemoration in the broad region. The idea of bringing home the human remains lost in foreign wars is a modern invention, closely tied to America’s public history since its Civil War times. South Korea’s excavation activity has contributed to expanding this originally American tradition to an international practice, eventually involving China. Therefore, perhaps it could be argued that the commemoration of war has increasingly become an American art (epitomized by the slogan “Untile the Last Man Comes Home”) in this part of the world, irrespective of the fact that different states and societies within the region may not understand what they do in this light. In 2014–2015, public enthusiasm in China concerning their homecoming heroes was nearly indistinguishable from what we had witnessed before in the US regarding its own heroes from Korea. The immensely popular “Resist US Aggression and Aid Korea” war campaign (i.e., Korean War) film in China, My War (2016), which features hill fights between the Chinese and US forces, testifies to this, and so does the following box-office hit, The Battle at Lake Changjin (2021). These films were released when tensions between the United States and the People’s Republic of China were escalating on economic and military fronts, and because of this, there was a renewed interest in the Korean War, this time, as an episode of Sino-American relations. In this sense, the Korean War’s Hill Fights is far from an old history only but increasingly a vital site of memory where the history and legacy of the Korean War as an international conflict are vigorously contested between two of the most powerful political entities of the contemporary world, China and the US.

Since the end of the Cold War in the early 1990s, this Sino-American dimension of the Korean War has been the subject of prolific investigations. This is in part because of the growing availability of previously inaccessible archival sources held in the former Soviet Union, China, and elsewhere in former Eastern Bloc countries. The growing attention on the Korean War as a pivotal episode of US-Chinese relations is also because the implications of this particular dimension of the war reverberate strongly in the unfolding contemporary world politics. It is a broadly shared view among scholars of American history that the United States became a military superpower through the Korean War, and China’s pursuit of a great power status today, according to some historians of China, began with its active role in the Korean War (that is, in place of the USSR). Taking note of these facts, we may add that in the escalation of hostility between these two powers, the diffusion of the art and politics of MIA/KIA recovery from one to the other power played a rather significant part.

The unaccounted-for remains of the Korean War have other geopolitical properties, however. Earlier I mentioned the two distinct phases of the 1950–1953 war. One was the standoff between North Korea’s rapidly advancing People’s Army forces and the South Korean and US defences along the Nakdong river in the environs of Daegu. Excavations on this battleground have recovered primarily Korean bodies (many of the KPA recruits were, as mentioned, South Korean students and youth hastily mobilized within the KPA-occupied areas, and most of the fallen American bodies had been removed from the sites during the war and immediately afterwards). In contrast, the sites of chaotic hill fights, along the rugged mountain regions of central Korea, host a diverse group of fallen soldiers—American, British, Canadian, Ethiopian, French and other UN troops, as well as Chinese and Korean. What distinguishes these two phases was the northward advance of the US and South Korean troops following the ambitious manoeuvre in Incheon in September 1950 that broke the will and morale of the KPA forces. It also involves China’s all-out intervention in the theatre of the Korean War starting in late October 1950. Forced into a hasty and chaotic retreat, both the US and South Korean forces failed to recover numerous bodies of their fallen comrades during this time. The recovery of these long-lost bodies became a key issue in the negotiation between Washington and Pyongyang for possible rapprochement. This transpired primarily in the decade of the 1990s, during which Washington pursued a similar policy in relation to Vietnam. The MIA-focused diplomatic initiative was abruptly discontinued under the George W. Bush’s administration, shortly after Bush’s so-called Axis of Evil speech on January 29, 2002, in which he designated North Korea as part of three terrorism-breeding rogue states, together with Iraq and Iran.

Forensic work along the former Nakdong parameter in the environs of Dagu primarily concerned, as mentioned, the remains of the Korean fallen. The Korean KIA/MIA taskforce consisted of a search-and-find team and an identification team, with the latter responsible for the classification of the found remains by racial and national belongings, as well as for DNA specification and storage. Those identified as belonging to the northern army are brought to a burial place near the Demilitarized Zone. As their activity went on, this place changed its name from the previous Cemetery for Enemy Soldiers to the Cemetery of North Korean and Chinese Combatants, a notable amendment indeed.

One memorable episode was about a vivid dream that a member of the Korean KIA mission, an archaeology student, had one night. In her dream, a young woman wearing the uniform of a KPA officer was indignant at the archaeologist. The officer slapped her face, saying "How dare you treat my body that way!". Hearing the story over the breakfast, members of the excavation team concluded that the incident related to one of the few sets of human remains the team was working on during the previous days. We knew that the archaeology student mishandled one thigh bone, breaking it into two pieces. Although the KPA officer was a southern Korean in origin (her remains were discovered together with two personal items, which indicated that before the war, the fallen soldier was a college student in Seoul), these “enemy remains” did not go through further identification procedure such as DNA extraction and recording. The last was reserved for the human remains that were identified, during the excavation team’s initial screening, as belonging to South Korea’s national army.

In contrast to these places, the work on old hill fight sites often yielded a more diverse collection of remains in terms of racial and national profiles, especially in places that had witnessed chaotic hand-to-hand fights. Many of these battlegrounds also changed hands several times. Having spent nearly two generations together, these remains parted company as they were being unearthed. They were moved to different resting places-laboratories and then South Korea’s national cemeteries, temporary shelters near the Demilitarized Zone, and the cemetery of war martyrs in China, which are all, despite directional differences, commonly organized in discreet national groupings. Once gone this way, the old resting places (that is, the excavation sites on the hills) revert to unremarkable bushes, leaving no trace of cohabitation among groups and individuals across the thresholds of racial, national and political differences.
Mixed Graves

The above phenomenon speaks of the established art of war commemoration in modern politics. Modern war cemeteries embody some core principles of modern political life. Equality and fraternity are among them, as observed in the many World War I cemeteries dotting the former Western Front in northern France and western Flanders. In these places, the bodies of fallen soldiers are buried in simple, identical individual graves irrespective of their differences in class, rank and other social backgrounds—thus the principle of equality or "democracy of death" as Thomas Laqueur calls it. Collectively, the fallen soldiers are typically divided into discrete national groupings and put to rest in separate national cemeteries.

There are exceptions, however. Notable among them is the St-Symphorien military cemetery east of Mons in Belgium. Most soldiers buried in this place had fallen in the very early days of WWI, during the Battle of Mons, before the war evolved into the trench warfare further west. The brutality of the trench war is well known: so are its tragic consequences. The victims of the trench warfare were mostly retained by their respective national armies and buried accordingly within the generally stagnant parameters to which these armies were holding on, with tremendous sacrifice of human lives. In contrast, the earlier conflict represented by the battle of Mons was mobile and chaotic, with battlefronts changing rapidly in time, which resulted in the bodies of fallen soldiers being lost to the enemy group. Military burial customs were yet undetermined in those early days of the conflict: the dead bodies were often hastily buried in village woods or elsewhere readily available. The result was military graveyard, such as the St-Symphorien cemetery, where one group of fallen soldiers came to share their resting space with their enemies.

The St-Symphorien military cemetery keeps 284 German graves and 229 Commonwealth graves, including those of several Irish and Canadian servicemen. Although their graves are organized into discreet, separate national groupings within the immaculately landscaped cemetery, the place as a whole constitutes a unique site of memory whose structure departs considerably from that of other better-known Western Front cemeteries. The idea of equality applies to both structural forms: in St-Symphorien, as elsewhere, soldiers are buried in simple, nearly identical graves (although headstones slightly differ between British and German graves). However, the idea of fraternity, clearly and prominently manifested in others places, is far less certain in St-Symphorien. In the latter, whereas British and German graves make up small circles of separate fraternal solidarity, the relationship between these collectives of graves cannot be identified in the same language of solidarity or according to the existing idea of fraternity and national unity that are familiar in the history of modern war.

Currently, the manifest symbolic property of the St-Symphorien cemetery is not national solidarity but an identity of solidarity that transcends national origins. In August 2014, in the run-up to the centenary of WWI in 2014–2018, the UK government decided to foreground the message of conciliation for its WWI Centenary, choosing to inaugurate the 4-year process at the British–German cemetery in St-Symphorien. This followed the German and the French initiative to hold joint commemorative ceremonies at several locations in northern France. The Centenary attracted a great deal of interests from the national and the local administrations of Europe, involving focused attention to the aesthetics of mixed graveyard and to the related conciliatory gestures of collaborative commemoration.

Where Are My Neighbors?

The question then is: Can we find a place like St-Symphorien in the old theatre of the Korean War—at a time when there is a need to do so? This time can be a time when a genuine peace is found in the region and when the sense of a community of nations has become a reality—a prospect still unforeseeable at the moment. Otherwise, it can be a time of crisis building up for a renewed conflict and in view of this crisis, when the conscientious public can reflect on the futility and brutality of war.

In fact, hundreds of St-Symphorien stand on the old grounds of the Korean War’s hill fights. As the public policy of “Until the Last Man Comes Home” advances, however, these sites disappear from view and their unique compositions are obliterated.⁶ The ethos of "Until the Last Man Comes Home" is vital to the moral integrity of the modern nation state, and it undoubtedly constitutes a far more superior form of dealing with modern warfare’s mass human sacrifice than, for instance, what we witness at the eastern end of Europe today, where bodies of fallen soldiers are reportedly being abandoned by their comrades-in-arms. However, this democracy of death may have its own limits and at times, may need to be counterbalanced by a different ethics and aesthetics of death commemoration that can go beyond the prevailing art of commemoration of the past century, singularly centred on the integrity of a national community.

I believe that modern forensic anthropology is strong in its discomfort with the friend/enemy contrast and in its vocational ethics that takes all remains of the dead, whether friends or enemies, equally meaningful and all telling unique stories. This was the case with my colleagues and the students of anthropology and archaeology with whom I was privileged to work together during my time with the Korean Army’s KIA taskforce. Their judicious and painstaking work, nevertheless, also breaks apart the community of co-dwelling fallen soldiers and contributes to encapsulating them in narrowly defined fraternities.

At the end of a laborious day under the scorching sun, the diggers, as we were called, although utterly exhausted, are happy to have achieved some meaningful recovery and to have helped some old soldiers to find a way back to their homes. Am I alone, however, in feeling uncertain, now and then, about whether what we achieved that day was truly the right thing to do? Is there a way to do justice to the long common, intimate, neighborly existence of these fallen soldiers—to preserve this material history that is no longer a material fact in the hills of the old Hill Fight? Am I wrong to imagine if some of the old soldiers of the Korean War Hill Fight, back in their homeland and resting in nice and beautifully landscaped national cemeteries, might wonder, now and then, "Where are my close old neighbors?"

Thank you.

The Reasons for Cultural Diversity : A Topic of Our Generation
[ Original title : A Topic of Our Generation, the Reasons for Cultural Diversity ]

Abstract

I - The diversity of cultures

The diversity of cultures is the world’s present, both its relevance and its richness. Ours is a fragile and fertile moment: the world now intersects sufficiently for its diversity to be encountered, and diversity is not yet buried under the steamroller of standardization. - Or perhaps it’s already too late: hasn’t diversity already been lost? But could we not rebuild this Diversity, forever lost to the Traveler, in our minds? For it is true that these cultural resources are under threat, just as so many of nature’s resources are today. Already, the multiplicity of languages is being reduced before our very eyes, at an accelerating pace, to the convenience of Globish and its widespread Communication under the pressure of the global market. At the same time, new nationalisms are emerging that claim to confine cultures to stubborn allegiances, claiming their “identity” with complacent clichés and aiming for imperialism. In fact, isn’t one the correlate of the other, as if one could compensate for the other?
Will we die under the boredom of one (the loss of Diversity) or the stupidity of the other (the claim to identity)? Or will we not die from both, one dragging the other in its wake?

One thing, consequently, is certain: we need to find another way out of this impasse in which the human being tends to wither away instead of unfolding: one that unravels this knot of constraints, thwarts its fatality, and henceforth posits inter-culturality as the dimension of the world – the dimension that "makes the world". But what will "inter-culturality" mean if we don’t abandon the term to its mere poster effect? If we want to make it the ethical and political term of a common future for humanity? Because, as we well know, the cultural only ever happen singularly: a language, an era, an environment, an adventure of the mind, the sudden audacity of a thought... What, then, must this between, in "between cultures" imply – as well as in the intra-culturality of one culture, if indeed it is "one" – in order for a reflexive, operative, inter-active vis-à-vis to happen, enabling us to explore the gaps between these singularities, so that those singularities, establishing themselves opposite each other, can effectively begin to "exchange"? Haven’t we spoken too comfortably of the "dialogue" of cultures, contradicting the clash which threatens today, without probing the condition of its possibility? Because for a start, in what language will this dialogue take place?

II - What’s in it for philosophy?

This is why the question of inter-culturality is of immediate interest to philosophy, which is positioned within the universal, and rightly so, it believes. It "interests" philosophy at its heart or center, not in a peripheral, marginal or “comparative” way – such a comparison remains external, decorative, and doesn’t work. Philosophy is henceforth called upon to leave Europe, by a necessity internal to its vocation, to rise outside its own language and history, to encounter other languages and other thoughts whose resources it cannot imagine from within its own language and thought. Who could dispute that this is a matter of urgency, before such a possibility is swallowed up by so-called "global" thinking: not universal, as we would readily believe, but uniform and standardized? These resources from elsewhere reveal other possible paths of thought, or, let’s say, other configurations of the thinkable. As a result, they question philosophy about what it doesn’t think of questioning. No longer only about what it thinks, but about what it doesn’t even know that it isn’t thinking about, what it hasn’t thought of thinking about: what has (European) philosophy missed out on?

For philosophy, this is much more than a critique or a new moment in its history. Because it is precisely a question of emerging at last from its history, from both its connivance and its atavism. By giving it something to think about, from the outside, in return, and firstly on the singularity of its advent, these resources from elsewhere encourage philosophy to probe its implicit choices, its buried biases, naively emerging as "evidence" (the "natural light" of the Classical Age), in other words its unthought: what its thinking is unknowingly based on – thereby putting its Reason back to work. Throughout the twentieth century, the greatest philosophers, from Husserl to Merleau-Ponty and Derrida, let glimpse that philosophy had known a "Western" destiny – but what does "Western" mean? And first of all, in these two joint dimensions of logos and Being, in other words, of "logo-centrism"? Such concern had already beset Nietzsche, the first philologist of philosophy – Hegel being content, as we know, in his History of Philosophy, to let philosophy be born in the East (where the sun "rises"...), but only to have it effectively come into being in the West: at sunset, when Minerva’s owl rises, and under the Greek invention of the concept becoming the main instrument of thought. Now, a new time is dawning, in which languages and thoughts from elsewhere are to be actively brought into the philosophizable.
However, when we say that (European) philosophy must “meet with” other thoughts, the formula is still too easy because it presupposes possibilities that have already been granted. For how can thoughts expressed in different languages be effectively brought into contact with each other, especially if these languages are not of the same language family, as is the case in the Indo-European, and, moreover, are part of cultural contexts that have ignored each other for so long? How can they effectively “open up” to each other, so that one thought can hear the other’s reasons from this Other’s point of view, without immediately dragging them back into the clutches of its prejudice, or rather, further ahead of time, of its pre-thought – pre-notioned, pre-supposed, pre-questioned – and this on both sides? “Reasons”: doesn’t this term also come too soon, is it not itself too narrow – doesn’t it already need to be reopened and reworked?

More generally, how can two experiences of both life and thought be understood in relation to each other, and maybe even through the mediation of each other, when at the same time they have been exclusive of each other, and when one side initially encounters so many difficulties in starting to stammer in the other’s language? Unless we start by positing some kind of universal, which can only be of ideological rather than logical content, or postulating a given human nature, we can only begin to risk it at the cost of infinite trial and error, which each time, gives us something to think about, vertiginously questioning thought in what it doesn’t know how to think about: and thus calls for so many approximations and corrections, comments and explanations, gradually weaving an in-between [entre] – of inter-culturality – where the encounter can take place. So, through persevering work of elaborating of the between, and firstly, of translation, at least if we understand that to translate is not to straightaway put one under the other, to transpose one into the language of the other, but to overflow the languages through each other and begin to set up the conditions of possibility of this between. Only then will it be possible, patiently and through mutual intelligence, to gradually create a shared field of both experience and thought. Otherwise, we’ll think we have “dialogued”, but we won’t even have begun to approach. We will have remained in the semblance of a pseudo-dialogue. But this is not ancient history, or pitfalls avoided at a moment’s notice, for the risk is undoubtedly even greater today, in a regime of globalized Communication.

III- The universal, the uniform, the common

To enter this debate, we need to clarify the terms, otherwise we’ll get bogged down. This applies first and foremost to these three rival terms: the universal, the uniform and the common. Not only do we run the risk of confusing them, but we must also cleanse each of them of the ambiguity that taints it. At the vertex of this triangle, the universal itself has in fact two meanings that must be distinguished – otherwise we won’t understand where its sharpness comes from, nor what is at stake for society. The first is what we might call a weak sense, of observation, limited to experience: we note, as far as we have been able to observe so far, that this is always the case. This sense is general. It is unproblematic and unobjectionable. But the universal also has a strong sense, that of strict or rigorous universality – which is what we in Europe have made a requirement of our thinking: we claim, from the outset, before any confirmation by experience, and even without it, that such and such a thing must be so. Not only has it been like this up to now, but it cannot be otherwise. This “universal” is no longer simply one of generality, but one of necessity: a universality that is not de facto, but (a priori) de jure: not comparative, but absolute: not so much extensive as imperative. It was based on this universality, in its strong and rigorous sense, that the Greeks founded the possibility of science: it is on this basis that classical Europe, transporting it from mathematics to physics (Newton), conceived of “universal laws of nature” with the success we know.
But with this, the question arises, dividing modernity: this rigorous universality to which science owes its power: as the universal applies its logical necessity to natural phenomena, or mathematics to physics, is it just as relevant to conduct? Is it likewise relevant in the ethical domain? Is our conduct subject to the absolute necessity of moral imperatives, “categorical” (in the Kantian sense), like the a priori necessity that has made physics such an undisputed success? Or should we not claim, in the separate domain of morality, in the (secret) retreat of inner experience, the right to what is to be thought of as the opposite of the universal: the individual or the singular (as Nietzsche or Kierkegaard have done)? The question arises even more because, in this sphere of subjects and, more generally, of society, we can see that the term “universal” hardly ever escapes its ambiguity. When we speak of “universal history” (or “universal exhibition”), the universal seems to be one of totalization and generality, but not of necessity. But is the same true when we speak of the universality of human rights, and do we not then credit them with a necessity in principle? But where is the legitimacy? Is it not abusively imposed?

The question arises even more today, given that we have since had this major experience. In fact, it’s one of the decisive experiences of our time: we are discovering today, as we encounter other cultures, that this demand for universality, which has driven European science and which classical morality has claimed as its own, is nothing less than universal. But that it’s rather singular: that is, the opposite, being – at least when brought to this point of necessity – proper to the cultural history of Europe alone. And firstly, how does one translate the “universal” when one leaves Europe? This is also why this demand for the universal, which we in Europe had comfortably placed in the credo of our assurances, in the principle of our self-evidence, should finally become salient again, in our eyes coming out of its banality, appearing inventive, audacious, and even adventurous. Some might even discover, from outside Europe, a fascinating strangeness to it.

The notion of uniform is equally ambiguous. One might actually think that it is the fulfillment and realization of the universal. But, in fact, it is its flip side: or rather, I’d say, it is its perversion. For the uniform is not a matter of reason like the universal, but of production: it is nothing but the standard and the stereotype. It stems not from necessity but from convenience: isn’t uniformity cheaper to produce? Whereas the universal is “turned towards the One”, the One being its ideal term, the uniform is merely the repetition of one, “formed” in an identical way, and is no longer inventive. But this confusion is all the more dangerous today, when globalization means that we see the same things reproduced and disseminated throughout the world. As these are the only things we see, because they saturate the landscape, we are tempted to credit them with the legitimacy of the universal, i. e. with a necessity in principle, when in fact, it is nothing more than an extension of the market and its justification is purely economic. The fact that, thanks to technical and media means, the uniformity of lifestyles, objects, and goods, as well as discourses and opinions, now tends to cover the planet from one end to the other, does not mean that they are universal. Even if they were to be found absolutely everywhere, a ‘what ought to be’ [devoir-être] is lacking.

If the universal is a matter of logic, and the uniform belongs to the economic sphere, the common has a political dimension: the common is that which is shared. It was from this concept that the Greeks conceived the City. In contrast to the uniform, the common is not the similar; and this distinction is all the more important today, when, under the standardization imposed by globalization, we are tempted to think of the common in terms of reduction to the similar, in other words, to assimilation. But this common of the similar, if it is a common at all, is poor. That’s why, on the contrary, we need to promote the common that is not the similar: only this is intensive; only this is productive. This is what I’m here to claim. Because only the common that is not the similar is effective. Or, as a French painter of modernity, Braque, put it: “the common is true, the similar is false”. And he illustrated this with two painters: “Trouillebert looks like Corot, but they have nothing in common.” This is the crucial point today, whatever the scale of the common we’re considering – the City, the nation, or humanity: only if we promote a common that is not a reduction to the uniform, will the common of this community be active, effectively giving people something to share.

The common is not decreed, as the universal is, but is partly given: such is the common of my family or my “nation”, which comes to me by birth. Partly, it is something that is decided, and properly speaking, chosen: such is the commonality of a political movement, an association, or a party, of any collective commitment. As such, this commonality of sharing is distributed progressively: I have something in common with those closest to me, with those who belong to the same country, with those who speak the same language, but also with all humans, indeed with the entire animal kingdom, and even more broadly, with all living things – with this wider commonality ecology is now concerned with. Sharing the common is, indeed, in principle, extensive. But this “common”, as such, is also equivocal. For the limit that defines the interior of sharing can turn into its opposite. It can turn into a boundary that excludes all the others from this common. The inclusive is revealed in the process to be its reverse, exclusive. In closing inwards, it expels outwards, and such is the common becoming intolerant of communitarianism.

IV- Is the universal an outdated notion?

The concept of the universal, which in its strong sense has been the driving force behind the development of European culture, is today in trouble. And this from two angles. Not only does it find itself to be in contradiction with itself, as we come to realize through encounters with other cultures that it is the product of a singular history of thought. But moreover, the singular history from which it springs in Europe does not in itself possess, when considered in its extension, the character of necessity that it’d imply in its principle. Indeed, once we leave behind a strictly philosophical perspective and consider the formation of this notion within the more general – cultural development of what was to become Europe, we realize how much the advent of the universal is part of a composite, not to say chaotic, history: based on diverse, and sometimes even opposing planes, it is difficult to perceive what articulates these from within. I’ll mention at least three: the (Greek) philosophical level of the concept; the (Roman) legal level of citizenship; and the (Christian) religious level of salvation. What is the “necessary” relationship between them, and does it even form a “history”?

One thing, in any case, is certain, and that is that one form of the universal has been invalidated: that of totalization or completeness. When we believe we have achieved the universal, it’s because we do not know what’s missing from this universality. When the Van Eyck brothers, in the Ghent altarpiece, paint crowds from all over the world converging toward the altar of the mystical Lamb – while above is enthroned a God who appears to be both Father and Son, and in the background are walls that could equally be those of Jerusalem or Ghent – they are painting an outdated universal. Not only by virtue of the apocalyptic message that is expressed, but because this panoramic universal has no idea of what’s lacking in its totality. Because it takes itself for granted, and definitively arrived, and no longer cares about what it may lack: because it rests in its positivity and no longer gives rise to progress. It is no longer promising but it’s satisfied. Thus, for over a century, we have been able to speak of “universal” suffrage without considering that women were still excluded.

The universal, in other words, is to be conceived in opposition to universalism, the latter imposing its hegemony and believing itself to possess universality. The universal which we must campaign for is, on the contrary, a rebellious universal, which is never fulfilled: or let’s say a negative universal undoing the comfort of any interrupted positivity: not totalizing (saturating), but on the contrary, reopening the lack in any accomplished totality. A regulating universal (in the sense of the Kantian “idea”) which, because it’s never satisfied, never ceases to push back the horizon and keeps us endlessly searching. But this universal is precious not only theoretically, but also politically: it is what we need to claim for the deployment of the common. For it is this concern for the universal, promoting its ideality[ïdeeel] as a never-achieved ideal, that calls on the common not to limit itself so soon. It’s this concern that must be invoked to ensure that the sharing of the common remains open, that it doesn’t turn into a frontier, that it doesn’t turn into its opposite: the exclusion from which communitarianism springs.

This means then, that the universal is not encountered immediately – or, at any rate, that it’s not guaranteed: that it is not given: it is not the soft pillow upon which our heads can rest. There’s nothing to say that the diversity of languages and cultures can fit into the “universal” categories that European knowledge has developed over the course of its history. On the other hand, if it is projected as a horizon before us, as a horizon that can never be reached, as an ideal that can never be satisfied, the universal is something to search for. The fact that it is posited as a requirement will encourage cultures not to withdraw into their “differences”, not to become complacent in what would be their “essence”, but to remain turned – stretched – towards other cultures, other languages and other ways of thinking; and to never cease, therefore, to rework themselves in line with this requirement, and thus also to mutate – in other words, to remain alive.

V- Gap / difference : identity or fecundity (resources)

The question then becomes: how do we deal with cultural diversity the moment we don’t let it disappear under the standardization of the uniform, and save the common from confusion with the similar? We usually talk in terms of “difference” and “identity”, an old pairing inherited from philosophy, which, since the Greeks, has proven to be so effective in the field of knowledge. But are they appropriate to this debate? Should we really account for the diversity of cultures in differential terms and according to specific traits, held to be characteristic, from which would derive an identity for each culture thus differentiated? I’m afraid we’re mistaken about the concepts here, and since these concepts are inadequate, the debate cannot move forward. That is to say, I believe that a debate on cultural “identity” is flawed in principle. That’s why I’m proposing a conceptual shift: instead of invoking difference, I propose to approach the diversity of cultures in terms of gap[écart]; instead of identity, in terms of resource or fecundity. This is not a matter of semantic refinement, but of introducing a divergence – or let’s say a gap – that will enable us to re-configure the debate: to get it out of its rut and re-engage it in a more assured way.

What difference should be established between “gap” and “difference”, if I want to define them in relation to each other? Both mark a separation: but difference from the angle of distinction, and gap from that of distance. Hence, difference is classifying, as analysis operates through resemblance and difference: at the same time, it’s identifying: it is by proceeding “from difference to difference”, as Aristotle puts it, that we arrive at the ultimate difference, delivering the essence of the thing, which its definition enunciates. In the face of this, the gap reveals itself as a figure, not of identification, but of exploration, bringing to light another possibility. As a result, the gap does not have a classification function, drawing up typologies, as difference does, but consists precisely in going beyond them: it produces, not a tidying-up (dérangement), but a disturbance (dérangement). We commonly say: “to make a deviation” (faire un écart) (“how far does the deviation go?” (jusqu’ou va l’écart?), that is, break away from the norm and the ordinary – such are already deviations in language or conduct. Deviation is therefore opposed to the expected, the predictable, the conventional. Whereas difference aims at description and therefore proceeds by determination, deviation engages in prospecting: it envisages – probes – how far other paths can be blazed. It is adventurous.

Let’s take a closer look at the difference at stake. Difference, insofar as it proceeds by distinction, separates a species from others and establishes by comparison what makes it specific. At the same time, it presupposes a neighboring genre within which the difference is marked, and results in the determination of an identity. But will this be relevant to approach the diversity of cultures? For, in so doing, once it has distinguished one term from the other, difference leaves that other aside. So, if I define (A) by difference from (B), once I’ve defined (A) in relation to (B), I drop (B), for which I have no further use: once the distinction has been made, each of the two terms forgets the other; each goes back to its own way.

In the gap, on the other hand, the two separated terms remain facing each other – and this is what makes the gap so precious to think about. The distance formed between them maintains the tension between what is separated. But what does it mean to stay “in tension”? In the gap, through the distance that appears but which is not unlimited and remains active, each of the two terms remains opposite the other. One remains open to the other, stretched by it, and never ceases to have to apprehend itself in this vis-à-vis. This facing each other remains in action, alive: it remains intensive. If, in difference, in other words, each of the terms being compared – each having allowed their essence to be discerned by opposition – only has to fall back on this essence, apprehended in its purity, here in the gap, on the other hand, the two separated terms, staying in tension with each other – this “with” remaining active – never cease to have to measure themselves against the other: never cease to discover themselves in the other, both exploring and reflecting themselves through it. Each remains dependent on the other for self-knowledge and cannot withdraw into what would be its own identity. The gap, by the distance opened between them, has given rise to an “in-between”, and this in-between is active. In the difference, each having returned to its own side, having separated from the other to better identify its own identity, there is no “between” that opens up, and nothing more happens. In the gap, on the other hand, it is thanks to the between opened up by the distance that each one – instead of withdrawing into itself, resting within itself – remains turned towards the other, put in tension by it – in which the gap has an ethical and political vocation. In this between opened between the two, an intensity unfolds that overflows them and makes them work: we can already see what the relationship between cultures could gain from this.

It’s true that we don’t know how to think about the “between”. For the between is not “being”. That’s why, in Europe, we’ve been unable to think about it for so long. Because the Greeks thought of Being in terms of “being”, that is, in terms of determination and property, and consequently abhorred the undetermined, they were unable to think of the “between”, which is neither the one nor the other, but where each is overwhelmed by the other, dispossessed of its own self and “property”. This is why, unable to think of the “between”, metaxu, they thought of the “beyond”, meta, of ”meta-physics”. For the between, which is neither one nor the other, has no "in-itself"[en-soi], no essence, nothing of its own. Strictly speaking, the between "is" not. But this does not mean it is "neutral", i. e. inoperative. For it is in the "in-between", that in-between opened up by the gap and which cannot be absorbed, that "something" actually passes (happens) which breaks down belonging and property, which is built by difference, and identity is thus undone. We need to get out of thinking about (ontological) Being to begin to think this. This is what painters already did before the philosophers. Braque again: "what lies between the apple and the plate can also be painted."

As for difference, its fate is linked to identity, and doubly so, on both sides. On the one hand, at its outset, beforehand, it presupposes a common genre, a shared identity, within which it marks a specification. And, on the other hand, when it reaches its aim and destination, it leads to ascertaining an identity, fixing the essence and its definition. In this way, as I’ve said, difference is identifying. But the gap takes us out of the identity perspective: it reveals not an identity, but what I’d call a "fecundity" or, put another way, a resource.
By opening, the gap raises another possibility. It uncovers other resources we hadn’t considered, nor even suspected. By stepping outside the expected, the conventional ("make a deviation"), by detaching itself from the familiar, the gap, disturbing as it is, brings to the surface "something" that initially escapes thought. In this way, it is fruitful: it does not, by classification, give rise to knowledge; but, by the tension it creates, prompts reflection. In the in-between that it opens up – the intensive, inventive between – the gap gives us something to work on, because the two terms that stand out from it, and that it keeps in view, never cease to question each other in the gap that appears. Each remains concerned by the other and doesn’t close themselves off. And isn’t this what the relationship between cultures can take advantage of, rather than retreating into "differences"?
To the point of recognizing what will be my thesis today: there is no such thing as “cultural identity”.

We need to consider the cost of muddling up concepts. We need to measure how dangerous – politically speaking – it can be to approach cultural diversity in terms of difference and identity: how costly it can be not only for thought, but also for history. A book like Samuel P. Huntington’s The Clash of Civilizations is memorable in this respect. Of course, it was his description of the world’s major cultures ("Chinese/ "Islamic/ "Western") in terms of their differences and hence their identities, his establishment of characteristic features, and consequent tabulation and sorting into a typology that, convenient as it was, made the book such a success. Because of course, it didn’t disturb anything, it didn’t open up any departures from the conventional: it didn’t undo any of the clichés – prejudices – to which we like to reduce cultures in order to avoid bothering. By failing to recognize the heterogeneity inherent in every culture (its internal “heterotopia”, in other words), which is precisely what it unfolds from within, intensifying it through deviation, we also follow the easy path of classification and reassure ourselves. But is there a pure "core" of culture? Not only does Huntington fail to grasp anything interesting about these cultures, reducing them to banalities, but isolating them from one another, walling them off in what would be their respective specificities, their most marked differences, folding them in on their "identity", he can consequently only end in a "clash" between them, as indeed he titled the book: a clash.
VI- "Dia-logue"

The famous "dialogue of cultures" has been imagined in many ways. We have notably dreamt of synthesis, with cultures coming together and complementing each other to form a unified whole. It’s a dream of a blissful understanding in which divergences fade away, where the common prevails over the diverse by absorbing it. The image has been complacently projected between “East” and “West” as the poles of human experience – East and West, the great symbolic marriage. These cultures would each rise on its own slope, and at the summit, be in harmony. But in what language will this coupling take place? Wouldn’t it be within Western categories, now globalized and reduced to Globish? The various cultures outside the West will be no more than exotic variations. The new globalized culture may well present itself as the Parliament of the world, which itself promises to be representative and democratically inclusive of all diverse currents, but this will not call into question the implicit cultural framework – illusorily universal, since it is only a camouflaged standardization – within which this gathering will take place. And like all motions for synthesis, this one, by resolving tensions and blurring differences, will be terribly boring, as I warned at the outset. Above all, the common will be factitious: it will not have made the diverse work to promote itself as common.

Or else, in order to highlight a commonality that would be authentic because it would be original, we’ll be asking what the common denominator between cultures would be. The opposite of synthesis is analysis: we break down all the diversity of cultures into their primary elements to discern what overlaps. If not as a core that would be identical, this commonality could at least be identified as a "comparable relationship" between terms, an "analogous" form of interaction or mediation. In its desire to contribute to a global, now planetary ethic, Unesco has worked hard in the last decades of the twentieth century to identify the points of agreement. It has thus been said, as a minimal element, but one that would be irrefutable, that all moral conceptions and all religious traditions throughout the world advocate "peace": “A vision of peoples living peacefully together”. After all, who wouldn’t wish for peace? – Well, Hegel? Or Heraclitus? Didn’t they explicitly call for war to highlight the function, including the ethical function, of the negative? Not only does any reduction of the diversity of cultures to some minimal element that would be common from the outset pull us back into the banality of truisms, but even these "truisms" are not true. A more significant logic has eluded them. If the complementarity of cultures always runs the risk of being merely the product of prior assimilation, but remains unsuspected, then the overlaps between cultures always run the risk, in turn, of being superficial, because they miss the most singular aspect of each culture. On both sides, by arbitrarily reducing the gap, cultures have lost their inventive resources.

A more serious – philosophical – attempt has also been made to discover a common logic of humanity in an ultimate foundation of reason that transcends all traditional paradigms of truth – those of adequacy with the thing or of an obviousness that imposes itself on consciousness. It is in the conditions of possibility of a meaningful discourse that, more radically, the community between men, as a “communicational” community, is to be sought (the path proposed by Apel and Habermas). The rules governing the use of language are rules whose validity has always been implicitly recognized as soon as one speaks, and which men would therefore a priori share. Since, as soon as we speak, to ourselves and to others, we pragmatically put them into practice, the consensus between men will no longer have to derive from any content of the statement, but from its form alone, and from what it necessarily presupposes by way of requisites, which, as such, are universal. And this undoubtedly applies if we remain within the framework of the European logos, as the Greeks conceived its requirements (already Aristotle’s principle of non-contradiction). But what if I leave Europe? Isn’t the whole discursive trickery of a Chinese thinker like Zhuangzi precisely able to thwart this supposedly common logic of communication? Then one would have to “speak without speaking”; or “find someone who forgets to speech to speak with him or her”… Or better still, isn’t the strategy of the Zen proposition (the kôan) to make this implicit protocol of rationality implode by sudden rupture? But will we then still be able to “dialogue”? And if the very protocol of dialogue is called into question, isn’t every principle of understanding between men, foundling a cultural common ground, irretrievably abandoned?

The very word “dialogue”, if truth be told, is itself historically tainted with suspicion. In the first place, it’s because the West had lost its power that it began to “dialogue” with other cultures. Previously, on the strength of not only its “universal” values, but even more so of its logical formalization, it did not engage in dialogue.
It imposed its universalism on other cultures, that is, colonized them by its triumphant rationality. And isn’t “dialogue” itself a soothing term that serves to conceal the power struggles that are constantly taking place between cultures, as well as within each language and each culture, with the coherences that prevail covering the others and burying them? Would Dialogue not claim to be a false irenicism? – Wouldn’t it adorn itself with a false egalitarianism? And firstly, in what language – the question comes up again – will this dialogue take place?
If it’s in the same language (for example, globalized English or Globish), the dialogue is biased from the outset:
as the meeting of cultures takes place on the terrain of one and the same language, that is, in its syntax and categories, other languages and cultures can only secondarily make their “differences” heard from this implied commonality, supposed to facilitate communication. This is often followed by a reactive demand for identity, all the more virulent as it is the only remaining response to this pre-imposed standardization.

But in the absence of dialogue, as we all know, it’s “shock” or clash – will we be able to get out of this alternative? Or, if dialogue seems like a last-ditch attempt to escape open violence, how can we give it a consistency that gives it dignity and establish it as a vocation? If dialogue is a “soft” term, then we need to give it a strong sense, and once again, the best way to do this is to draw on the language itself and probe its resource. Dia, in Greek, means both gap and crossing. A dia-logue, as the Greeks already knew, is even more fecund the greater the distance involved: otherwise, we’re saying more or less the same thing, the dialogue turns into a monologue for two, and the mind will make no progress. But dia also refers to the path across a space, even one that may offer resistance. A dia-logue is not immediate but takes time: a dialogue is a journey. It is gradually, patiently, that the respective positions – apart and distant as they are – discover each other, reflect each other, and slowly elaborate the conditions of possibility for an effective encounter. It takes time. – In the face of which logos states the commonality of the intelligible, the latter paradoxically being both the condition and the goal of this dia-logue. That is to say that, through the very gaps, a commonality is generated such that – each language and each thought, each position allowing itself to be overflowed by the other – a mutual intelligence can emerge in this between that has become active – even if it is never completely realized (which is what the potential of the intelligible states). A commonality that is not the result of lessening the gaps or forced assimilation; but which, through this internal tension in the gaps that give rise to work, is produced: not imposed, or taken for granted from the outset, but promoted.

Because by gradually and reciprocally bringing each perspective out of its exclusion – not for all that from its position, but from the blocked, walled-in nature of its position ignoring the other – the dia-logue gradually brings out a shared field of intelligence where each can start to hear the other. But where does the intelligence effect come from, and what makes it binding (rather than just obliging wishful thinking)? It’s because each one, undoing, not its position, but the exclusivity of its position, starts to put the other’s position opposite its own – and this within its own position. For such is the power of the gap, now opposite, and its capacity for mutual rupture through the tension it creates. Hence, by integrating the other’s position in one’s own horizon, each puts one’s own position back to work, taking it out of its solitary self-evidence. For, by considering the other’s position no longer only from a defensive angle, but according to what is then discovered as another possibility, each perceives at the same time its own position, listening to the other, from that outside which is this other: and consequently discovers, with regard to the other’s position, the unilaterality of its own: the position of each is unsealed, its boundary overrun – a movement, by so discreet a shift, has thus begun. As soon as a dialogue is initiated – provided, of course, it is not feigned or false – and for as long as it lasts, an in-between arises – as each position opens up to the other (such is the entre[twin]'s entre[twixt] of the “entre[see]”[interview]) – where thought goes back to work. In this in-between, thought once again passes through and can be activated. Far from being self-indulgent or merely soothing, only the device of the dia-logue is in itself operative. Otherwise, there will only always be the forced assimilation of one by the other, i.e. its “alienation”, and we won’t be out of the power struggles.

But in what language, on a global scale, will this dialogue between cultures take place? If it can’t take place in the language of one or the other without the other already being alienated, the answer for once is simple: the dialogue can only take place in each other’s language – in other words, between these languages: in the in-between opened up by translation. Since there is no third or mediating language (especially not globalized English or Globish), translation is the logical language of this dialogue. Or, to borrow a famous phrase, but transferring it from Europe to the world, translation must be the language of the world. The world to come must be a world of between-languages: not of a dominant language, whatever it may be, but of translation activating the resources of languages in relation to each other. Discovering one another at the same time as getting back to work to enable us to move from one to the other. A single language would be so much more convenient, it’s true, but it imposes standardization from the outset. Interaction will be easier, but there will be nothing left to exchange, or at least nothing that is truly singular. As everything is immediately tidied up in a single language, with no more disturbing deviations, each language-thought – each culture – has, as I said, no choice but to stubbornly assert its “differences” as part of its identity. Translation, on the other hand, is the elementary and conclusive implementation of the dia-logue. It reveals the latter’s discomfort, its non-final character, always being repeated and never completed; but also its effectiveness: a communality of intelligence is elaborated in its in-between and comes to be deployed therein.

Intelligence, as developed by the diversity of languages and thoughts, is not a finite, arrested understanding (as was the Kantian understanding of categories). But the more it is called upon to traverse diverse intelligibilities, as in the dia-logue of cultures, the more it is called upon to promote itself: the more intelligent it becomes. In fact, it is one of the opportunities of our times, in the face of global standardization, to be able to open up to other coherences and, consequently, to other modes of intelligibility, through the discovery of other languages and cultures. Particularly for Europe: when encountering other languages and cultures, European thought does not have to invert its previous complacency, that of its universalism, into a guilty conscience, or even just relativism. Nor does it have to convert (to some factitious “Orient”), but it does have the chance to question itself from outside itself, and thus to put its reason back to work. For it is in the name of a logical universal, a universal in the a priori strong sense, and not by invoking some definition of man or human nature, always ideo-logical, that I posit such a commonality of the intelligible. This commonality of the intelligible is the commonality of the human: while men may never fully understand each other, nor between each other’s cultures, it is nevertheless to be posited in principle – as an a priori necessity (and transcendental of the human) – that they can understand each other and that it is only the possibility of understanding this diversity of the human – such as through languages – that makes the “human”.

the chicken industry began in Dalgubeol(formerly known as Deagu) to provide a variety of meat to the people who were impoverished after the Korean War. Since the 1970s and 1980s, chicken-related brands have been many companies such as Mexican Chicken, Mexicana, Cheogatiip Seasoned Chicken, Smoky Chicken, etc. Currently well-know brands include Kyochon Chicken, Deagu Whole Chicken, Tangdang Chicken, Byeoelbyol Chicken, Jongguk Idumari Chicken, Chicken Party, and Hosik Idumari Chicken.

5. FILM COLLOQUIUM

FILM COLLOQUIUM 1

TITLE | 2023 AAS-in-Asia Film Colloquium (Cinematic Connections of East-Asia)
DATE | 24th June Sat, 26th June Mon
VENUE | HKH (Humanity Korea Hall) Rm#B101

Background and Objectives

Film is a good visual medium of historical documentation. Through films, we can better understand the historical and cultural assets of Asia in world history.

The film colloquium aims to explore the essence of human beings beyond time and space and the emergence of a new humanistic discourse in Asian studies in the post-COVID-19 era.

The film colloquium includes a conversation with the famous Korean film director Jegyu Kang, and his film screening “My way” (2011).

Details

A talk : Inviting renowned Korean director and a talk with him.
Movie Showing : East Asian Film Screening and Talk with Audience (GV) Participant : Conference participants and general audience.

A TALK WITH THE DIRECTOR

TITLE | Film Colloquium Conversation with Director Je-gyu Kang
DATE | 24th June Sat, 12:00-13:00
VENUE | HKH (Humanity Korea Hall) Rm#B101
TOPIC | Film Colloquium Conversation with Director Je-gyu Kang
HOST | Je-gyu Kang
MODERATOR | Owen Cho

Details

1) Director’s philosophy on films on East Asian topics related to colonialism, history, war, reconciliation, civil war, etc.
2) The awareness of the crisis situation in East Asia during the transition period and the future of Korean films in it
3) (East) the possibility of Asian cinema
While travelling to the French National Library (BnF) to see Jikji, the world’s oldest movable metal type book printed in Korea, a Canadian, David Redman discovers that no one knows anything about the book printed in Korea in 1377. Realizing Eurocentrism is at play, David sets off on a journey through Europe and Korea with Sarang Ness and the Jikji team to find how the print technology transferred from 13th Century Koryo to Europe.

PLOT

In World War II-era Korea, rival runners, one Korean (Jang Dong-gun) and one Japanese (Joe Odagiri), go to war together against the Soviets.
